Notes:

1. Breach of commitment on the part of the suspects. Depending on the charges, an accused may be released until he or she appears before the judge. In such a case, the accused will have conditions to respect (undertaking or recognizance). If he or she does not respect these conditions (do not consume alcohol, respect curfew, do not contact the victim, etc.), new breakage charges will be laid.

2. The accused was sentenced and found guilty. He/she must follow his probation and respect the conditions. If the probation officer notes a breach of the conditions of freedom, new charges of breach of probation are brought.

3. The accused was sentenced of incarceration but at home or in the community. He/she must meet conditions such as staying at home 24 hours a day, except for school and work, not consuming alcohol or drug, etc. If the accused do not respect the conditions of his conditional sentence order, the judge can send him to prison to finish his sentence.
